A: I think it is safe to assume that no one is reading the tags. A: I'm a bit late to this, but I think that Jeff Atwood has already proven that tags are entirely optional. In case you missed his answer, this is the relevant link to the relevant question. The Nation's Future: Making the Future of Business a Tomorrow's Business The Nation's Future: Making the Future of Business a Tomorrow's Business is a 2004 book by economist Benjamin M. Barber. Barber, in a quest for a new kind of economic thinking, argues that the "Age of Permanent Growth" is over, and that there must be a transition to something else. The book's title comes from a statement by Paul Ormerod, an editor of The Economist. It serves as a counterweight to Michael E. Porter's Competitive Strategy: Techniques for Analyzing Industries (1980), an analysis of how businesses compete and what they can learn from each other's success. Reviews Book review Barber's argument is that the growth imperative of present-day business thinking is not sustainable, and that as a result the logic of permanent growth will be a thing of the past. For Barber the great risk of the present day is loss of continuity, as resources are redirected to growth and away from those activities which actually keep the world economy functioning. An example is the potential of optical fibre, which may be coming in two years, and then in 20 years' time is already marginal. The book cites a wide range of examples of the mistakes of the past, including the massive increase in the scale of manufacturing after the Second World War.
