These components are available in all .a) Field of the Invention The present invention relates to noise exclusion or isolation means for metal processing furnaces, and more particularly to apparatus which can be readily positioned in and withdrawn from the interior of a furnace and which can be easily and simply actuated from the exterior of the furnace to close the furnace and to eliminate the noise generated by gas flow in the furnace and to provide a system and method for accomplishing the same. b) Background of the Prior Art The metal processing industry has long recognized that the operation of a metal processing furnace causes noise to emanate therefrom, and workers in the industry have constantly sought ways to shield or otherwise muffle the noise. Considerable effort has been expended in the metal processing industry to remove, dampen or muffle the noise caused by the furnace, and this effort has been expended in many areas including the development of various types of muffling or noise isolation systems for use within the furnace. Traditional muffling systems for metal processing furnaces have been developed over the years, and may be grouped into several categories including those systems which comprise a sound isolation chamber having an open bottom, and those systems which comprise a sound isolation chamber having a closed bottom. In the former category, air is introduced into the chamber through a blower motor, and is then expelled through a system of exhaust tubes and other related tubes and pipes. The noise, which is generated as the air passes through the exhaust pipes and tubes, is muffled by passing it through the cooling air or by the equivalent absorption of the noise by the mass of air. The latter category of noise isolation systems can be further grouped into those which comprise a sound isolation chamber of a generally planar configuration, and those which comprise a sound isolation chamber which is a box-like structure.
