While it is an unfortunate fact that the world's biodiversity is continuing to decline, it's not just "global warming," nor are most species immune to this sudden shift of climate and the loss of habitat. We can't stop Mother Nature from adapting to a changing climate, but we can change our own habits and habits that we can change. It's an uphill battle, but why not face it head-on and see what we can do to make a difference? My assumption was that there would be a lot of information available about ichthyosaurs from museum collections around the world. I did a search for the word ichthyosaur on the internet, and more than expected. I got nearly 1000 hits. Many of those documents provided lots of taxonomic information, but not very much about the history of the topic. Then, after downloading a couple of books, I learned that the bibliography from these books probably had all the information I'd ever need. So, after locating a couple of early ichthyosaur publications, I dug into their bibliographies and found the original sources of data. Writing my own book took longer than I'd anticipated, and I've been thinking about it ever since. Finally, I decided that the first chapter should be a brief description of ichthyosaurs. It would be easy to do this, and it could be a "teaser" for Chapter 2, "Hypotheses." The goal for the first chapter was to grab the readers interest and draw them into the story in the second chapter, but I couldn't expect that to happen by simply listing names and dates of discoveries. As I wrote the introduction for Chapter 2, it became clear to me that the next chapter would be devoted to how we got to where we are, so I was able to narrow my focus and really begin to plan out how to relate ichthyosaur paleontology to life in the 21st century. I've been practicing my skills in creative writing, which have been greatly enhanced by Jeff Donahue's ebook, "Brief Essays to Better Your Writing." I found that my writing d4474df7b8
