vitamin B6 in human serum, blood, and tissue were established. In order to ascertain the stability of vitamin B6 in blood and tissue, the concentrations of pyridoxine and pyridoxal in the blood and tissue after incubation of the blood and tissue at 37 degrees C for 3 days were measured. The concentrations of pyridoxine and pyridoxal in blood and tissue increased with incubation time in a dose-dependent manner and the levels in blood and tissue reached saturation after incubation for 2 to 3 days.

Therefore, it is suggested that the concentrations of pyridoxine and pyridoxal in blood and tissue may increase with time and that the level of the vitamin B6 in blood and tissue may reach a saturation point after the intravenous administration of the vitamin. The assay methods for the vitamin B6 in blood and tissue may be useful for the diagnosis of pyridoxine-responsive encephalopathy.
