The individual and society's contributions to the cost of psychiatric care. This paper analyzes the social and individual cost of psychiatric care. It does so by examining the experiences of the currently cared-for and ill individuals' and the estimated cost that would be incurred if these individuals were released from institutional care. It is argued that the individual experience of residential care is a consequence of the social circumstances in which he is caught. The individual is shaped and directed by institutions and their programs. If he is fortunate he may benefit through the provision of meaningful work. If he is less fortunate he may have reduced access to work or be employed in what is considered a menial job. The frequency with which he may receive public assistance or private charity is determined by social circumstances and a poverty trap is established. The unfortunate individual may not only be buried in the institutions but within the society that has ba244e880a
