But while bodybuilding Strong can heal any swelling and bruising, his body does not always work as well as we'd like. Some of it is age, he's 74. His joints are stiff and his tendons are frayed. He describes his own manliness and sexuality as still being real, but "I'm kind of lived in." This is the point in his life that bodybuilders who want to be more asexual versions of themselves struggle with. Even if they have the curves, the muscles, the physique, they still struggle because they lack the manliness. So, in the pursuit of this ideal the time to clear away all that's mundane and build something truly romantic with their lives is in the past. But what happens when you turn 40? If you are serious about being this person and you are trying to do this change, do you change everything, or part of everything, and find a new version of your self that takes into account how your body is changing? Not all of us are so lucky. From the conversation, it was clear that this is a limited problem with the way gay men are portrayed on television. There are many episodes in TV history where gay men are in a relationship. But it is clear that these episodes have not been part of our culture. It is certainly not part of what our culture has meant to us in the last 30 years. Some of this is because gay culture was not really allowed to be a part of our culture. In the same way that we have a generation of straight women that equate romance with looking like a sexpot. We have a generation of straight women that equate romance with looking like a sexpot. It is true, and I've seen this in myself and in my circle. You can see it in women in their 30s who still carry themselves in a way that is sexy. You can see it in women in their 30s who still carry themselves in a
