The present invention relates to the transmission of data, and more particularly, to a method and apparatus for transferring data to and from a sensor, such as a FireWire sensor, using a serial interface port of the sensor and a dedicated serial interface. Many medical devices, for example, infusion pumps, continuous glucose monitors, and ventilators, include sensors that perform various diagnostic functions. For example, an infusion pump may include a blood glucose sensing portion that receives blood from a user's body and that outputs a glucose level indicating a measurement. Infusion pumps may provide the output data over a wired data connection. More sophisticated infusion pumps may additionally receive the data from the wired connection and use the data to perform various operations, such as adjusting a rate of infusing the insulin based on the output data. To transfer data to the infusion pump, a user may manually input the data from a computer into the infusion pump via a serial port, for example. Such manual entries may be convenient and, as such, are prevalent in the medical industry. However, for many medical applications, the cost and complexity of providing a wired connection and manually entering data may be an impractical solution. For example, although some infusion pumps include wired data connections, there are not enough such wired connections to accommodate the number of users of such infusion pumps. Another issue is that a physician needs to spend time interfacing with the pump to transfer data to the pump via the wired data connection. As a result, there is a need for improved ways to transfer data between medical devices, such as infusion pumps, and sensor outputs. for a detox kit, or are they limiting their use to certain systems and using them in conjunction with maintenance? We are only just starting to
