* Digital negatives (DNGs). An image's color, contrast, and brightness are adjusted using sliders, but with Photoshop you can also use layers to sharpen, emboss, and soften an image. You can even make cross-process corrections that take into account different kinds of film stock. Image-editing features and the ability to link different elements together make Photoshop a powerful application for correcting and enhancing poor-quality images, especially negatives and slides.

Q: Refactoring a TensorFlow model to minimize the code volume I'm trying to refactor a TensorFlow model from the code base of an old project which has multiple issues with its code quality. Among those, one of the biggest problems is it uses a lot of variable names in the code. I have successfully minimized a lot of these name conflicts by following this answer. However, I'm facing a problem trying to minimize all the names conflicts in the model I'm refactoring. I'm looking for a way to rename all the variables and parameters of the model in order to make it as concise as possible. My research so far lead me to use the `tf.function()` refactoring. Therefore, I've built a string form of my code along with every variable name in it. I've tried the TensorFlow model directory that has about 80 files. To use the `tf.function()`, I've used this command: `python -m venv venv from venv import multi_virtualenv venv = multi_virtualenv() venv.reset() venv.create_environment() from __future__ import absolute_import from __future__ import division from __future__ import print_function from tensorflow.contrib.keras.python.keras import backend as K from tensorflow.contrib.keras.python.keras import losses import functools from tensorflow.python.framework import ops from tensorflow.python.framework import tensor_shape import tensorflow as tf import tensorflow.contrib.layers as l from tensorflow.contrib.framework.python.ops import nest def get_new_variables(): for v in tf.trainable_variables(): if v.name == 'Y' or v.name == 'Z': continue if v.name.endswith('d'): continue new_v = tf.Variable(1) new_v = tf.assign(v, new_v)`
